

Converging Worlds: Navigating the New Integrated Communications Environment

PRSA 2012 International Conference – San Francisco – Monday, October 15

With a seemingly endless flood of new communications avenues, vehicles, techniques and viewpoints, danger looms large for many public relations practitioners. It's all too easy to carve out a small section of familiar territory, plant your flag, and hope the whirlwind leaves you unscathed. In reality, that's a recipe for career and organizational disaster.

This professional development seminar helps communicators discover, understand, blend and deploy a broad range of traditional and emerging disciplines. The resulting insights, strategies and tactics from your own "custom blend" – unencumbered by outdated rules – will have your executives applauding, your employees engaged, your customers buying, and your competitors trembling.

What we'll cover:

- Uncovering the next breed of communications toolsets, keeping you one step ahead.
- Navigating the politics of leading cross-discipline communications, turning naysayers into supporters.
- Capitalizing on "white space" territories that you and your team can embrace.
- Blending new media with old for even more creative, exciting and results-bearing programs.
- Determining when digital media should take the lead, when it should be dialed down in favor of more seasoned approaches.
- Reinvigorating "forgotten" techniques and outlets for surprising success.
- Perfecting the snowball approach, formulating a "can't miss" messaging stream by weaving together multiple disciplines.
- Measuring the successes (and failures) of your integrated communications efforts, allowing future programs to have an even greater impact.
